TITLE: Personal relationships and Agency Conflicts: Case of Buying and Supplying firms in Australia

ABSTRACT: Personal relationships have been the subject of a lot of research in the business discipline, with most of the writing concentrating on either positive or negative firm-level results of such connections. In any case, insightful research still can't seem to address the contentions that develop among senior managers and their individual firms, when a personal relationship is available between managers of purchasing and providing firm in the supply chain network. This paper tends to this significant gap in the writing. For exploratory purposes, the investigation is subjective in nature utilizing the phenomenological technique. By and large, 30 semi-structured interviews with senior managers of buying and supplying firms from Australian manufacturing and service sector. Results from this investigation show that personal connections between senior managers and their firms create five distinct clashes among senior managers and their particular firms with a possibility to produce negative results for firms. Further, discoveries from this examination recommend firms ought to stay mindful when depending on directors' close to personal connections inside between firm connections, accordingly personal connections can possibly go amiss from the enthusiasm of their firm. The paper at long last finishes up by talking about confinements and suggestions for future research.
